How Blowholes Work: When the winds are coming from the South East then waves enter the mouth of the Blowhole and compress the air within the inner cavity. Contrary to popular belief the tides do not have any bearing on the performance of the blowhole. The escaping air causes the loud "oomph", which accompanies the water spout. Over many years the Blowhole will become less vigorous, as the underground cavity erodes due to the pounding waves. As the retreating water leaves, it is forced upward by the compressed air, as the mouth is still blocked by the receding wave.

Blowhole History: The main Kiama Blowhole was discovered by George Bass on his voyage of coastal exploration on December 6, 1797, after anchoring his whaleboat in the sheltered bay which became Kiama Harbour. Bass was not, in fact, the first to discover the Kiama Blowhole, as local Aboriginals had for generations referred to it as Khanterintee.

Little Blowhole : A smaller "Little Blowhole" is located a few minutes south of the main Blowhole in Tingira Crescent. The Little Blowhole performs best under moderate seas when the winds are coming from a northerly direction.
